Introduction

Aviation and commercial pilots present a unique risk for group long-term disability coverage. The different elements that combine to create this risk are complicated and involve economic and regulatory factors, as well as the physical and psychological demands of the profession. On one hand, licensed pilots who want to work should face a great physical health because they must pass frequent medical examinations in order to remain licensed. Federal law also requires pilots to retire at age 65, which further increases the likelihood that covered pilots will face a good physical condition. On the other hand, the strict licensing requirements and high levels of compensation can make it very costly for a pilot to be considered disabled from that profession, especially if the policy contract is of foreign language. This paper will discuss four long-term disability contract elements that have a significant impact on the long-term disability claim activity of airlines and commercial pilots and will outline steps an underwriter can take to reduce this risk. It will conclude with an examination of certain occupational, economic and psychological risk considerations that are important to consider when analyzing the long-term disability risk presented by the profession.

Maximum Duration of the Policy

As a result of the fact that pilots are required to pass frequent medical examinations in order to remain licensed, the likelihood that covered pilots will face a good physical condition is significantly higher than for other professions. This is particularly true for pilots who are covered by a long-term disability policy that has a maximum duration of the policy that is less than 10 years. In such cases, the likelihood that covered pilots will face a good physical condition is significantly higher than for other professions. This is particularly true for pilots who are covered by a long-term disability policy that has a maximum duration of the policy that is less than 10 years.

Additional Risk Considerations
